Price US$28.00

- Can longer life in Brazil be associated with better quality of life for the survivors?
- How to allocate the responsibilities for the care of elderly people among the market, the family and the State?

The book focuses on the complexity and heterogeneity of the elderly Brazilians and their demands for social protection. It is expected that the Brazilian elderly population will continue to grow at fast speed. It is not known in what sort of conditions they will live.

Its aim is to analyse the dynamics of a rapidly ageing and differentiated population in the context of marked social transformations and fiscal adjustment. The opportunities and challenges of an effective social protection for the elderly population are looked at including public policies, private market and family support.
